VIII. --On the Training of Architectural Students. By Francis H. Newbery, Head Master, Glasgow School of Art. Read before the Architectural Section, 28th November, 1887. Drawing may be taught by tutors, but design only by Heaven. So says John Ruskin, a writer whose thoughts I shall have occasion more than once to call to my assistance; but, like other phrases coined by that aphorist in art, the sophistry of its meaning separates human execution too widely from human ambition--what we do from what we desire; and I would suggest that the sentence would read much better if it had, in addition, the wholesome and cheering proverb, Heaven helps them that help themselves. Genius or inspiration, when its existence is proved as belonging to any one man or work, may or may not be a Heaven-sent gift; but, believe me, study and practice go much further than is commonly supposed towards developing the latent powers of a man, else would genius knock in vain for admission, or, if the door be opened, be greeted as a stranger. How best, then, to cultivate the powers that belong to any ordinarily-endowed architectural student, so that he may, if not excel his fellows, take at least a position which may have the credit of a respectable mediocrity, and, leaving genius out of the question, educate him so that he may know what he has to do and do it, is my object to show. There comes a point in...
